Market Review

- US equities were largely unchanged in July, with the S&P 500 returning +0.03%. While corporate earnings and economic data remained generally supportive, gains in the broader market were tempered by weakness in large technology stocks, leading to a more muted overall market performance compared with earlier months.
- US technology equities experienced a pullback during the month, with the Nasdaq-100 declining -5.58%. The weakness was concentrated in semiconductor and AI-related names following a period of exceptionally strong performance. Despite the decline, AI remained a key market theme, although investor sentiment became more selective after the sector's substantial gains earlier in the year.
